

In a Fishing Country (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from In a Fishing Country After seventy years have sped - happy years leaving few traces of their eventless passing - it is none so easy to breathe the breath of life into that little summer colony mostly from Quebec and Montreal which Mr. Wrong in his Canadian Manor and its Seigneurs tells us was to be found at Pointe au Pic in 1850. Recollections are dimmed and unsure; of chronicles scarce any exist. The hour slips by for recording somewhat of ways and manners that are within the fading memory of a bare handful; well-nigh as remote and strange to the new comer as the daily walk and conversation of the Kings Farmer when he was shooting bears from his door-step and spearing salmon beside his house in the stream then famed before others as La Riviere Saumonais. Before sitting down to sort what miscellaneous jetsam time has left stranded, I attempt two or three long backward casts, and it is but kindly and honest to announce the intent to ease the task of the judicious reader who skips irrelevancies.
